Retrospective Summary

During the retrospective, we acknowledged a key issue: the tendency to leave tasks until the last minute, causing stress for the team. This was compounded by our unfamiliarity with the tech stack, leading to a steep learning curve. Although we grasped the basics for completing tasks, our understanding of the tools was incomplete, potentially posing future problems.

To address this, we've decided to front-load tasks in upcoming projects to avoid last-minute rushes and reduce stress. This shift aims to create a smoother workflow and enhance productivity. By tackling tasks earlier, we can distribute the workload more evenly and allow ample time for troubleshooting and refinement.

Despite these challenges, we successfully met our backlog goal. This success was due to accurate estimations and the dedicated contributions of each team member. While we celebrate this achievement, we understand the importance of addressing underlying issues to prevent future complications.

In future sprints, we'll prioritize gaining a deeper understanding of our tech stack. This proactive approach will involve investing time in comprehensive learning to improve our proficiency with the tools. By doing so, we can mitigate potential risks and leverage the tools more effectively as a team.

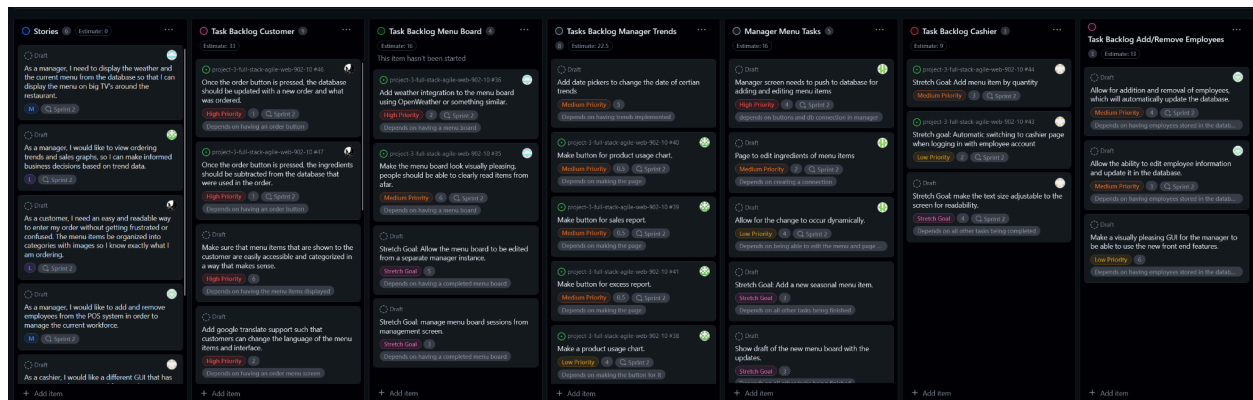

Overall, this retrospective provides a valuable opportunity for reflection and improvement. By confronting these challenges directly and implementing strategic changes, we're confident in our ability to navigate the project in the future more efficiently and cohesively.

Summary for the sprint: The number next to each team member name is the number of tasks completed. It's also the same amount assigned to them.

Burn-down Charts

Burndown Chart

Note: Tasks are updated during each meetings, the plateau from March 23rd to 29th was a result of no work being put into the project. Our story points are also relatively large so none of them are completed yet.
